All eyes are directed toward the two next comers and their burden. These are two gigantic Yeomen of the Guard, carrying, shoulder high, an immense brass dish, from the edge of which in a perfect circle, depend long red and white pures stringa, terminating in silicen tassels. On the top of the purses lay twelve well-filled bags of chamols leather. The dish is laid by the Yeomen of the Guard upon a tall, circular aoken table of ancient date that looks as if it might have been made for the purpose and for no other. Then the Yeomen of the Guard take their station, one on each side of the table, and behind them, on their way to the sacrarium, pass Dean Armytage Robinson, of Wells Cathedral, who is the lord high almoner; the subalmoner, Canon Shappard; the Lord Bishop Ryle, who is Dean of Westminster Abbey, and the canons of the Guard, some sixty in number, all armed with halberds, form a line on either side of the choir.

The office for the royal Maundy is then intoned by the Dean of Westminster, and at the conclusion of the first anthem, the first distribution takes place. The two Yeomen of the Guard lift the brass dish from the table, and march to the head of the line of women. They are followed by the lord high almoner, the subalmoner, and their secretaries, the latter in court dress, and passing along the line, the doles of money, representing about $10, all in newly minted silver, are handed by the lord high almoner to each of the recipients in turn, in antique red and white kid purses. A third anthem is sung, and then there is a second distribution, to the former recipients, of a second purse, containing another $10. Thereupon with a prayer for the King and Queen, and the royal family, and a benediction by the Dean of Westminster, the royal Maundy function at Westminster Abbey is closed.
